'The ancient Celts had always hoped for a sweet life somewhere beyond the waves, Tir na-Nog - the Land of Eternal Youth'

Sacred cartography in the British Isles applied to Ilha Santa Catarina, Brasil.

Divine order was established on Earth by centering a given region, which might be delimited by geographical features such as mountains, rivers, or ocean. In the British Isles, an entire island—for example, Ireland—could be identified as a complete and separate entity. It would then be “centered” by dividing it into four parts. This was accomplished by first determining its longest lengthwise axis (usually north-south), and then its widest east-west axis. Where these two axes crossed defined the sacred central precinct from which the high druid or, later, the Celtic king, would rule. Evidence of the existence of the ancient sacred precincts survives today in boundary roadways and the old county names. In Ireland, County Meath—which means “middle” in Old Irish—stands in the middle of the island, uniting four ancient quadrants that were later subdivided into smaller districts. Thus a central fifth element is introduced that unites the surrounding four districts.
